VIPs: Very Important Pups

Lyndon B. Johnson used to join his dog, Yuki, for howling duets during Oval Office visits.

James Garfield named his dog Veto.

Millie's book outsold George H. W. Bush's memoirs.

His chocolate Labrador retriever was named after Bill Clinton's favorite great-uncle. By having Buddy trained and neutered, the President set a good example for other pet owners.

George W. Bush's Scottish terrier Barney shares the White House with another Scottish terrier named Miss Beazley. While Barney and Miss Beazley love taking a romp outdoors, First Cat Willie prefers the peace and quiet of the White House library.

Warren Harding's Airedale terrier Laddie Boy sat in on Cabinet meetings in his own hand-carved chair. Newspapers often published spoof interviews with the pup.

Lucky would visit Ronald Reagan's office every morning for a doughnut.

Scottish terrier Fala belonged to Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Abraham Lincoln's dog Fido may not have been camera-shy, but he was always wary of White House visitors. He often ducked and hid under the couch.

Students will be interested to learn that all 43 of our nation's presidents shared their home with a pet, and all but five had dogs.
